Dagmar Soennecken, PhD

Dr. Dagmar Soennecken is an Associate Professor at York University (Toronto, Canada) where she is cross-appointed between the School of Public Policy and Administration (SPPA) and the Law and Society Program (Department of Social Science). From 2016 to 2020, she served as the academic director of the Master in Public Policy, Administration and Law (MPPAL) program. In 2019, she became the Editor-in-chief of Refuge: Canada's Journal on Refugees, one of the oldest academic, peer-reviewed journals on forced migration.

Legal and policy instruments at the global and European level increasingly emphasize the need to address the specific needs of vulnerable migrants. But what does it mean to be vulnerable? This talk is part of a larger, three-year, international research project (VULNER) funded by SSHRC, the FRQSC and the European Union's Horizon 2020 research and innovation programme under grant agreement No. 870845 . The aim of the VULNER project is to investigate this question through field research in Europe (Belgium, Germany, Italy, and Norway), Africa (Uganda and South Africa), the Middle East (Lebanon), and North America (Canada). Currently, there is no solid understanding of the concrete meanings, practical consequences, and legal implications of "vulnerability".
